AN ESCAPED CONVICT.

In After Years I Am Repaid for Lending Him Assistance.

As a boy, Harkens was advanced a long way ahead of the rest of us in career in knickerbockers. He was at periodical intervals a scout; and we never failed to envy him the luxuriant switch which he wore-borrowed in a surreptitious manner, from his mother's toilet arrangements. We envied that boy the possession of a mother who wore a switch; and we followed his leadership to the bloody fray, and rescued the victim from the burning stake, or dragged the palethe bloodthirsty aborigines of the wildwood.

Then he became a Corsair, a redhanded pirate. It was an epoch of sailing under his flag-a veritab skull and cross-bones, proudly defiant from the apex of the Harkens hen-

Then, after the piratical course had spent its fury, and after we had doubly-dyed our hands in the pokeberry blood of our victims, Harkens went upon an expedition right into the wilds of Central Africa. How the gloomy forests of that wondrous region loomed up before us, as the brave freedom leader led us into the depths! How we shot the fierce tiger, and lured the gigantic elephant to his doom! How we snatched from the very jaws of death, and restored to happy homes, the weak and defenceless maidens! That was boy life; that life which dream of happy days laid away in the past-the past so freighted with joys, and tinted with somber hues by the tears of disappointment.
